Umamahesh makes a film, it makes sense that it would be characterised by its flawed protagonist. That protagonist being a character with an American accent, a superstar like superstar that is. And the actor playing the role is a Tamil superstar, who has literally made a career out of playing a character with an American accent.

Director Krishna P. Umamahesh films in the US, and that's where he has found a couple of his best players. The Indian superstar plays an American, who is searching for his lost twin sister, played by a Tamil actress. Mamathkodi is a fictionalised version of the musician, Siddhartha. While Siddhartha is best remembered for his performances of devotional songs, which often captured the poetic quality of the different Indian languages, his '90s recordings were very much about another form of intense introspection. While most singers, of the day, often sang devotional songs on themes of love or praise, Siddhartha explored a more introspective, more personal realm. He explored the pleasures of solitude and solitude on a spiritual level.

While he was able to make the most of the influences of his Indian heritage, his music still had the earmarks of the West. Siddhartha's songs were sung with a lush, ruminative quality that few singers could have managed. A moment of stillness would be followed by a rush of strings, and the music would morph into a more austere style, with slowly building tension in the music, or sometimes just as simple as a single phrase in the music. He would sing about the beauty of the natural world, about the nature of love and the spiritual connection that lies in everything, but he sang mostly about personal events. Siddhartha explored many of the Indian classics, all performed in English, and some that were later translated. Some of his songs, however, could not be found on any record. But he recorded his work, which he liked to think of as a recording of his own soul. Some of his most memorable songs are those that explore the pain and pleasures of solitude. In " ", he sings, "You walked away, just like that, without a word. I don't know where you've gone 82157476af
